Alexandra Giancarlo is a multi-disciplinary settler scholar. She is an assistant professor in socio-cultural studies of sport and physical activity in the Faculty of Kinesiology at the University of Calgary. Her present research focuses on residential school histories, particularly those pertaining to student experiences with sports and recreation, and she has been working with survivors and their families for the past three years. Her other research interests include the connections between cultural identity, historical memory, physical culture, and well-being in Indigenous and Black communities.

Kristin Hall is a PhD candidate in history at the University of Waterloo and a sessional instructor at Laurentian University. Her research interests include late nineteenth- and twentieth-century Canadian gender, business, and cultural history as they relate to media and education. Her dissertation examines the Maclean Publishing Company's trade journals published between 1887 and 1914 and analyzes the promotion of business-to-business advertising through the lenses of gender performativity and informal education.

Scott McLean is a professor of sociology at the University of Calgary. His current research focuses on the historical sociology of university extension in Canada. Scott's past research has included studying the history of colonial rule in Nunavut and exploring the learning experiences of readers of self-help books. His professional practice has included teaching adult basic education in Nunavut, developing continuing education programs in agricultural leadership, community development, and health promotion, and serving as a senior university administrator in continuing education.
