REPORTS AND CONFERENCES

The 1993 Annual Conference of the History of Education Society was held at Plater College, Oxford, in December 1993. The theme of the conference, organized by Professor Alan McClelland of the University of Hull, was “Children at Risk.” Sixty-three participants from universities as far apart as Japan, North America, Sweden, and Ireland made it possible to discuss definitions and make comparisons from a wide variety of experiences. The opening and closing papers, by Dr. Hugh Cunningham of the University of Kent and Dr. Roy Lowe of the University of Birmingham, respectively, were presented to the full conference. Eight other papers were presented at three parallel sessions, and five short reports on work in progress were received. The three study groups active in the Society also met to hear papers or discuss topics related to the conference theme.

Dr. Cunningham’s paper contained a wide-ranging survey of interpretations of the history of childhood and discussed definitions of the term. He examined representations of children and raised a number of issues which set the tone for a fine conference and were developed over the course of the weekend.

Professor Bengt Sandin of the University of Linkoping, Sweden, in “Split Visions: Changing Childhoods and the Welfare State in Sweden—Ideals and Realities,” argued the notion of a diversity of childhood experiences in Sweden. By the 1930s child-care had become a public matter and definitions of childhood were set by the state. Led by specialist professionals, state initiatives provided facilities to enable children to reach the moral and physical standards set by the state.

Dr. Catriona Clear’s paper “Noiselessly and Calmly: Nuns and Social Responsibility for Children in Nineteenth-Century Ireland” was read in her absence by Professor Hyland. It was a vivid account of the role of nuns in the provision of education and training for girls. The varied provision offered showed that the nuns differentiated between the social background of their charges, with some of the girls at risk being offered limited training, while others were educated to a high standard. Within the sphere in which the nuns operated, and under the direction of the bishops, they were powerful; but outside, their influence was much more limited.

In an excellent paper, “Philanthropy and Children at Risk in the Netherlands in the 19th Century,” Dr. Dekker of the Rijksuniversiteit, Groningen, posed and answered three questions. How should the terms “philanthropy” and “children at risk” be defined and understood? How did Dutch philanthropists of the nineteenth century approach the problems of children at risk with specific reference to residential re-education? How far was Dutch philanthropy transformed by the state?

Barry Franklin, Associate Professor at Marietta College, Georgia, in “At-risk Children and the Common School Ideal,” showed how definitions of “at-risk” have changed over the past century and how the provision of special education for children in this category has generally segregated them. An alternative, but less popular, strand has integrated their education in the common school idea. Research has shown that very positive results have been obtained from this approach.

Papers will be published in a special issue of Aspects of Education.

"The 1944 Education Act: Fifty Years On" is the title of the 1994 Annual Conference. It will be held in Birmingham, 2-4 December 1994. Speakers will include Peter Gosden of Leeds, Deborah Thom of Cambridge, and Dennis Dean of London. Delegates are invited to contribute to the work in progress session. Contributions should not be longer than 15 minutes. If you wish to participate in this session please write to Professor Gary McCulloch, Department of Educational Research, University of Lancaster, Lancaster LA1 4YJ, U.K.
